BY GUS MALBERT.

To the cynoscopical burrows of a pleased bunch of fans, the Colts yesterday, out at the Broad Street grassy breeder, galloped, prouetted and galloped to victory over Steve Griffiths' Bugs, tallying eight times, while a glorious cipher was the nearest thing to a count which the visitors did for the visitors during the nine sections of the game. There were no ifs and ands or buts in connection with the victory. It was clean-cut, straight from the shoulder, and of the old-fashioned variety, the kind of days when the Colts could go out and lick anybody, just for the pleasure of seeing the victim squirm.

From somewhere Manager Cowan brought out a brand-new kind of bug exterminator, though it was whispered that Hanks is the name of the death-dealing potion referred to. It was Mr. Hanks, who deals and cuts with his left hand, who administered the bitter dose to his erstwhile playmates. He started his artillery some minutes before the game being assisted by Catcher Edwards, who at times relieves Cowan.

Content and satisfied with his selection, he served everything to those faithful tobaccoists. Only once during the entire game did two safeties come together for the visitors, and whenever, by some mishap or miscalculation, a Griffith happened on a station, Hanks took a reef in his sails, cut out the safety valve and let fly, with the throttle thrown open.

Trouble Easily Cast Off.

On several occasions he got into seeming trouble, but trouble to Hanks served as an incentive to show what he could do. Steve Griffith exhorted and pleaded, but it availed nothing. The first hole which arose was really caused by Hanks himself. It was in the second assortment, and Jackson was walked. He breged to second, and Griffith beat a tap to Martin, Jackson advancing. Smith then hit to Hanks, who apparently, with plenty of time to spare, took the play at first, letting Smith, but letting Griffith walk on to second. Cowan heaved at three, which fooled him, and McCarty fouled six, had two strikes called, and then waited for four bad ones. Counting up and following this story closely you will find that three were on at this stage, with two down. Pitcher Griffith could not resist the temptation to swat at three first ones, and just exactly three were left on bases.

The next time danger appeared was in the seventh, when a hit by Cooper, a double by Griffith, which Wallace, by the way, was very nearly stabbing after a great run, produced exactly nothing in the run-getting line. At all other times Hanks was the good pitcher that he is, and will be from now on, into the fold he brought down the two other dependables on the Richmond slugging staff.

Luck Had Its Effect.

It all goes to show what effect a little luck will have on the outcome of the game. In the first session Ray Morgan, bought by Washington, hit between McQuinn and Wallace, both of whom were down. The ball, it rolled a few feet, and Morgan never letting up, took a wide sweep around second, knocking it for third. That isn't all. He beat the throw, but in trying to hook the bag over his head, he tagged him. Of course, this may not have had any effect, but the probabilities and the betting are the other way. Had Morgan been safe he would have given the Red Socks the bug, and there is nothing like having the bug in a ball game.

Add a Couple for Safety.

Blanks were drawn until the fifth, when, for the sake of safety and having in mind the fact that the Socks have a strong propensity for rallying toward the close, two more were counted from a trio of binglets. Wallace made his first hit of the game, and fast fielding kept him from capturing second. A moment later he was forced by Martin, who was carried around the circuit by Mattis and Baker, the former hitting for a couple and the latter singling and bringing both across.

But the banner inning from the local standpoint and disastrous from the standpoint of the visitors was the eighth. Great were the doings and high was the glow. Martin hit for a real hit, and so did Baker. Cowan and Hanks beat hits which never got beyond the skinned part of the diamond, and Dobson hit. All of these, aided by Smith's wild heave to Griffin to catch Dobson at third, which station he was endeavoring to pilfer, counted four times. By a little arithmetical calculation one may find that five safeties were made.

Auditing accounts.

Auditing accounts, it appears that fifteen hits for a total of eighteen bases, and proper advantage being taken of all opportunities, the bases being run in good fashion, produced a victory, and removed us just a trifle from the cellar position. The score:
